An up-to-date compilation of arguments for and against an increase of armaments in the United States, which will be very helpful for debates on this subject.

Woman, World War, and Permanent Peace. By May Wright Sewall. San Francisco: John J. Newbegin, 1915. 206 p.

Roadside Glimpses of the Great War. By Arthur Sweetser. New York: MacMillan, 1916. Illustrated. Price, $1.25 net.

A record of the actual experiences of a man who was held prisoner as a spy by both the German and French armies in the early months of the war, and who bicycled along Von Kluck's line of march in the swift advance on Paris. Mr. Sweetser took passage for Europe at the first news of war, and was probably the first correspondent in the zone of operations and in touch with the contending forces. He saw France invaded, and mingled with the people of that country and Belgium under the German occupation. His observation of armies in the field and his adventures in the attempt to work his way through them make an exciting narrative, while his association with innocent individuals caught in the current of war and his simple telling of the human stories of lives and homes wrecked in the conflict make the book a strong indictment of the methods and morality inseparable from armed strife.

Nationality and the War. By Arnold J. Toynbee. J. M. Dent & Sons, Ltd., London and Toronto, 1915.

An excellent book on the war, discussing mainly the problems of nationalism.

The Jews in the Eastern War Zone. Published by the American Jewish Committee, New York, 1916. 120 p.
